A Pretty Story Spoiled.

Edward King, in his last Paris letter to the Boston Journal, tell this exceedingly French story: "I think I have not told you the moving history of the rosiere of Dourdan. A rosiere is a young peasant girl that receives a crown, generally of orange blossoms, and a sum of money, from the municipal authorities of the locality where she resides, because she has been conspicuously virtuous. Each year, in a large number of parishes in the neighborhood of Paris, the ceremony of the rosiere is to be seen. The money given her is for her dowry, highly necessary in the country where a penniless girl has no chance whatever of marriage. Now, it is perhaps a rare thing for a peasant girl, occasionally in the vicinity of this capital, to merit the crown, and there is consequently much curiosity always manifested to see the strong-minded one who achieves the distinction. This year the rosiere of Dourdan was a charming rustic maiden who had joined to correct personal conduct a dutiful treatment of her invalid parents, and other virtues too rarely rewarded in this wicked world. Numerous were the spectators when she was crowned, and it was announced that in three months from that time she would receive the sum of 2,000 francs for her dowry money. She continued to enjoy the popular esteem until she came to get her money, when the Mayor's clerk, who was about to pay it to her, suddenly raised an objection on the ground that she was no longer entitled to it. The girl, after a little cross-examination, burst into tears, and admitted the truth of the rumor that she was in an interesting situation, but said she could not see how that affected her right to the money. At the time it was allotted to her she had every right to it and to her crown; what might have occurred since was the business of no one except herself and the man whom she intended to marry. But the municipal authorities did not regard the matter from her point of view, and held on to the money. Thereupon arose a discussion especially in the Parisian press, as to the girl's rights to the money, and dozens of columns have been written on the subject. The "rosiere of Dourdan," is likely to become as famous as Joan of Arc or the hapless Tyrian queen—not because she was crowned for virtue, but because her virtue seemed to fail so soon as she had got her crown and fancied that her dowry was secure.
